we used for classifying states as having a state-level permit requirement is simply that the state requires a permit, a state permit for the purchase and possession of firearms.

- Q. In your review of those -- of the literature and your research, did you consider any of the differences between those state permitting schemes and how that would affect your opinion?
- A. No, I'm not aware of any studies that have looked at details about how the permitting scheme is specifically done to try to differentiate, you know, whether there are certain features of the permit requirement that have differential effects.
- Q. So do you have an opinion as to whether particular details of a state permitting scheme are more or less important, essential to your conclusion about reduction of homicides and mass shootings?
- A. I don't believe that they are that important because the evidence is quite robust from multiple studies that have looked at multiple states, and we're not seeing discrepancies in the research so we're not seeing, you know, in one state there was an effect and another state there wasn't an effect.

Pretty much in every state that's been looked at there has been an effect, so my opinion would be that there is no reason to believe that details about the permitting system are going to change my opinion about its effectiveness.

- Q. So, for example, if different state law permitting schemes have different periods of time between how long it takes to apply for and obtain a permit, that in your opinion wouldn't change your conclusion in this case --
  - A. No.
  - Q. -- is that right?
- A. It wouldn't because, again, the evidence is so robust. The effect sizes are huge and the number of studies that were done in very different states that had very different details, none of that seems to make a difference. These studies are finding a large effect pretty much across the board.
- Q. In your view in reviewing the permitting schemes for the purchase and possession of firearms, are there any elements of those schemes, and we can get into it more specifically, that are more or less important to you in your conclusion that they reduce homicides and mass shootings?

In other words, these schemes have a lot of different pieces to them. Is there any core components that to you make up the effective part of
